and metaphorical potential. Ward lives and works in close proximity to his subject matter: He chooses media sourced from his local surroundings, delicately inserting his own experience in the work. He contributes to socio-political themes, including identity, race, religion, immigration, patriotism, tourism, and consumer culture, by imbuing his work with historic and personal narrative, while intentionally leaving obscured space for open-ended meaning.

One of the first pieces viewers' encounter in the exhibition, the sculptural installation Lit, demonstrates Ward's acumen for using everyday objects to create a tangible link between economic and societal reality, and spirituality. A light tower similar to those erected by the NYPD on street corners and parks to deter crime is installed horizontally, affixed to a ladder rendered useless by its concrete encasement. The lighting is employed to maximum effect, with the bright light beaming back on its capsized base and illuminating a pyramid shadow cast by the ladder. Behind the ladder, galvanized steel wash bins hold the remains of burning candles similar to those typically used in street memorials.

New York, April 27, 2017—Lehmann Maupin is pleased to present TILL, LIT, Nari Ward's fourth solo exhibition with the gallery. Ward will debut a series of new work comprised of mixed media paintings, sculptures, and installations. These works examine the ways value is assigned throughout society, with Ward attempting to disrupt existing monetary-based value structures in favor of social enrichment. On the occasion of this exhibition, Ward and Lehmann Maupin will donate a percentage of sales to Housing Works, the New York City-based nonprofit organization whose mission is to end the dual crisis of homelessness and AIDS.

Ward garnered acclaim early in his career with pieces like Amazing Grace (1993), which he produced while in residence at the Studio Museum in Harlem. For the sculptural installation Ward used hundreds of discarded strollers and recycled fire hoses woven to resemble a ship's hull as a reference to both the history of the transatlantic slave trade and today's homeless population. The methodologies implemented in this early work can be found throughout his career, with the artist repurposing found objects and placing them in juxtapositions that highlight their functional purposes, cultural associations, Ward has also created seemingly minimal paintings out of cash register drawers, referred to at the Till paintings, surrounded by faint rectangular forms on a background of metallic colors associated with money—gold, copper, and silver—that directly reference commerce. The size and shape of the rectangles repeated throughout the works recall a dollar bill, which Ward has indeed extracted from paper money, removing a margin so thin the alteration is undetectable to the naked eye, allowing the altered bills to remain legal tender.

Other large-scale paintings, Providence Spirits (Gold) and (Silver), use the bills to render the pyramid from the back of U.S. $1 bills as a focal point, however the faint outlines of the bricks appear to be laid in a frenetic manner that suggests the structure is on the verge of toppling. Ward overlays this contemporary monetary reference with cowry shells, an earlier form of currency found in many cultures, and gives the paintings a distinct patina by pouring and rubbing white rum flecked with gold and silver powder in a ritualistic fashion, producing an ethereal aura much like a Color Field painting.

Finally, in his installation Hanging study the bills are used to spell out the word “Reparations” across a series of panels propped up against the wall, the future hanging places designated in paper outlines. The aspirational placement of the paintings, and their current ‘tabling’ in lieu of action is a direct reference to the longstanding debate regarding atonement for America’s history of slavery and racial subjugation. Throughout all of these works, Ward treats the word “till” with double entendre in both noun and verb form, representing both a receptacle for capital, and allusion to the hidden or unacknowledged labor required in its acquisition.

In essence and action, TILL, LIT engages the value systems found in our relationship with currency, with the artist subverting this system to ultimately benefit those who have been undervalued and marginalized economically and socially. While politically minded, Ward is not an activist, but an alchemist, removing a small part of the transactional economy to add tangible value to the social transformation that takes place in art making.

Running concurrent with TILL, LIT in Chelsea, Socrates Sculpture Park in Queens will exhibit Nari Ward: G.O.A.T., again, through September 4, 2017, a series of newly commissioned outdoor artworks created on site by Ward, while a recent commission of his piece, We the People, is on view at the New-York Historical Society on the Upper West Side. His mid-career survey, Nari Ward: Sun Splashed, will be on view at The Institute of Contemporary Art/Boston, through September 4, 2017.
