Hong Kong, December 24, 2015—Lehmann Maupin is pleased to present Priv%te, a solo exhibition of new sculptural multimedia works by New York-based artist Tony Oursler. It is the artist's sixth solo show with the gallery. The exhibition features a mix of colorfully animated head-shaped panels inset with video screens. Inspired by the phenomenon of facial recognition, these wall-mounted works visualize a composite of digitized facial features and the algorithms designed and aggregated from them. These works maintain Oursler's longstanding interest in the role technology plays in human behavior, as digital media continues to permeate every aspect of daily life. The artist will be present for an opening reception on Thursday, January 14th, from 6-8PM.

In this new body of work, the artist focuses on the proliferation of big data and surveillance programs, but is particularly interested in the ramifications of facial recognition technology. This increasingly ubiquitous tool used across public, private, and government sectors tracks and identifies facial features, thereby allowing computers, for the first time, to achieve their own “vision” of us. These “data portraits” underscore Oursler’s uneasy relationship with technology, surveillance, and all manners of data tracking. The artworks seem to gaze at the viewer, evoking the larger cultural question of who is watching whom.

Inspired by the facial recognition techniques and algorithms currently in use in various public and private enterprises, including social media, Oursler employs a web of geometric designs, scattered data points, and various registration nodes integral to the composition of each work. He incorporates computer etchings representing mapping techniques and baseline characteristics essential to facial recognition. Sourced by the artist online, these various diagrams reference of how “big data” processes, categorizes, and aggregates the individual today. For all of us facial recognition will soon be linked to biometrics, spending patterns, and all manner of information collection, which the artist sees the sum as a new portrait.

This work lends itself to larger considerations about the digital cultivation and capture of personal identity as well as how and by whom this tracking is used—topics Oursler has studied and written on extensively, including methods for evading this detection. This body of work ultimately renders the technological realm from the counterpoint perspective of the machines that are increasingly modified to adapt human traits.

A pioneering figure of new media art since the early 1980s, Oursler developed his early practice under John Baldessari at CalArts, where he formed longstanding relationships with several of his fellow students, including Mike Kelley, John Miller, and Jim Shaw. This context encouraged Oursler to work outside of traditional media structures, and experiment with cross-pollination between painting, sculpture, video, installation, performance, language, music, and sound. Oursler continues to pioneer the intersection of art and technology in multimedia works that have in turn inspired subsequent generations of artists working digitally and across media platforms.
